The Sulzer administration, the constitutional convention of 1915, the legislative session of 1916--in these periods state budget making emerged from obscurity into newspaper wrangles. Political leaders in many parties have come to discuss the question. more familiarly than can most college professors of finance--yet. More literature has been written about New York s budget convulsions than about the budgets of all other states. For a decade to come college classes will wade through this empire state literature and revel in its complications, contradictions and inconclusiveness. Yet in many respects the state and science of budget making are in New York more backward in 1916 than in 1907 when Governor Hughes made the first official plea for budget reform. Why more backward? Because in Governor Hughes plan popular control via popular information was the keynote, whereas in 1916 popular information and popular control have been lost in the shuffle of legislative budget vs. executive budget. In seven ways, however, most other states can benefit from following advance steps taken by the 1916 legislature in New York. 1. The governor has a fund of $6,450 for analyzing estimates. 2. The legislature has given a joint committee $18,400 for clerks to study budget needs between this year s adjournment and next year s budget voting. 3. The governor must submit estimates with his own recommendation, i. e., a tentative executive budget, at the opening of the legislature. 4. The legislative committee must submit...
