Reverberation, of which echo may be considered a special case, is produced by the multiple reflections of a sound wave from one surface to another, causing prolongation and consequent overlapping of two successive sounds, with resultant blurring of speech and music. The laws governing this condition have been worked out and tested both in the laboratory and in practical application with unfailing success, and with remarkable agreement between theoretical and actual conditions. The other phase of the subject so far to be attacked is that of sound distribution. If a note of steady pitch is sounded in a room with reflecting surfaces, a stationary wave system is set up with well defined points of maximum and minimum loudness, which differ in position with the pitch. Since a given point in the room may be so situated as to give a maximum for one pitch and a minimum or some intermediate intensity at the same point for another pitch, it is evident that either speech or a chord of music, both being composed of a number of tones of different pitch sounded simultaneously, will be unbalanced in the relative intensity of its various tones and so distorted. Professor Sabine has, by an ingenious device, experimentally plotted the distribution of intensity for a given pitch in a given room, and has shown it to be very complex. He has...
