In Lawrence, my hometown we had Lawtons by the Sea. Lawtons was typical of Lawrence and atypical of everywhere else in the world. First of all it had a fire hydrant in the lobby. It wasn't really a fire hydrant but it looked like a fire hydrant. It was some sort of on/off valve that had something to do with regulating the flow of water or water level of the canal that sat just behind Lawtons back door hence the comic description, Lawtons by the Sea. The canals that were constructed back in the 1800s to provide power to the textile machinery and were the reason for the initial existence of the town of Lawrence, MA, added another colorful euphemism to the old Mill Town lore. We laughingly referred to our polluted, little, textile village as the Venice of the Northeast. Reading about that other Venice over in Italy, surprisingly, it seems to be just about as polluted as our little Venice. Not only that, that Italian Venice is sinking. Lawrence may be going down hill, but it is not sinking yet. They only served Essem hot dogs at Lawtons. Essem dogs were another local icon. Everybody ate Essem hot dogs in Lawrence. A butcher shop needed no large variety of hot dogs, only Essems. Yes em, its Essem, was their famous advertisement. It was on the radio, the billboards and wherever the option was available. Lawtons was also famous for deep frying their Essem hot dogs. I imagine it just happened one night after a Lowell Lawrence football game. The crowd piled in and some imaginative grill man decided to speed things up and just started tossing the...
